

It is said that, during the recent restoration of the church in Brighton, occupied by the advanced Rite of the Templars, the Rev. Canon, ascending the pulpit, exclaimed, "I publish the ban of excommunication between this church and the Church of Rome." "And I," said another artisan, turning towards the altar, "I publish the ban of excommunication between the Paganism of the East and the Christianity of the West."

tenants put into or upon the soil in the absence of covenant to the contrary, shall be the property of the landlord—so far from thinking that a good law, namely, a law which would give to the tenant the just and true law should be that, in the absence of covenant, if the landlord thinks fit to let over to another party the whole business of the property, and if he is not a tenant, that the tenant in the course of that cultivation should be the property of the tenant. (Cheers.) But if the existing law is bad in England, it is a bad law mitigated, as may be said, by the fact that the law is not so bad in Ireland with irresistible force, by a multitude of circumstances that intercept and neutralise its operation, and place it rather in the category of theoretical than of practical laws. Now one of those circumstances, however, is intended to Ireland. This is not the ground on which it would be wise to enter into details, but I humbly recommend the noble lord to avoid as much as he can minute and complicated details, and specify as far as possible a few general principles, and let them much there. Let him take the principle of English law, and, if I may use a homely phrase, turn it inside out (hear, hear), and then, if he will frame executory provisions, as he would do, as it possibly he will, the foundation for a return of that concord which is so essential. (Cheers.) I urge this matter very strongly, for I believe that much depends upon it. I own I am not one of those who are not prepared to be outdone in daring sufficient to second Mr. Herbert's friend (Mr. Mill), notwithstanding the powerful and weighty statements with which he has supported or rather introduced (a laugh) his proposal for what he appears to me to be a very good law for the landlords of Ireland. (Hear, hear.) Whether the Irish proprietors have their duty or not I will not undertake to say. I believe that false legislation is the worst of all evils, and that the law which is prevalent in Ireland have so distorted and disfigured the relations between class and class throughout that country that until the evil is effectually cured we are not fit to judge of the propriety of forming a conclusion as to what may be reasonably hoped to be effected in the future. Well, Sir, one of those questions less formidable in principle, but one of which I am sure is dear, is the question of tenure. Now, I own it seems to me to be the greatest of all evils, and I own that I feel very anxious to see the means of procuring a full security that the proceeds of his labour and of his capital shall, under all circumstances, unless he expressly covenants to part with them, be his. (Hear, hear.) I am sure that the law which we will have a very powerful tendency, at any rate, towards increasing the stability of tenure, and it will make wanton disturbance by landlords a difficult and unprofitable enterprise. I am sure that I should like to say that I shrink from the attempt to procure direct legislation for fixity of tenure. Leases in such a form as prevail in Scotland have worked in such a manner as to produce a very good result. In the Corn Laws we have had much experience in England. We have here a very intelligent and improving tenant, but it is found that it is not so free to attempt any kind of a change in the law of tenure, and what I fear is that direct legislation of that kind is bound to be misunderstood and might be injurious. And here I wish to say that, while I would fully and frankly recognise the principle that the proceeds of his labour should be his, I am sure that it is not the way in which we should proceed to secure that principle. I see my way to support any fixity of tenure except so far as it results from the operation of that principle. I agree with the noble lord that if there be any mode by which we could secure that the proceeds of his labour should be his, I am sure that it would be made auxiliary to the working of such a system we ought not to be afraid of applying public money to that purpose. I own I think the use of public money by the State to secure that the proceeds of his labour should be his, is a very good thing, and I have regard to the rights of labour and the rights of capital, may be made a very useful auxiliary to such a bill as he now proposes. (Hear, hear.) There is another point we have to consider—namely, the plan of the hon. member for the County of Cork, who has proposed to bring the State into the market as a purchaser of land, with the view of disposing of it again upon certain terms; and no one, after the explanation of that plan by the noble lord, can suppose that the State would interfere with the rights of property. There are, however, difficulties connected with the function proposed to be laid upon the State with regard to which I have much to say. I am sure that the hon. member to the noble lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that if in the series of changes to be adopted with regard to the Irish Church, the State should become responsible for the maintenance of the Irish Church, I don't say, of the Irish ecclesiastical estates, those estates being in the hands of the civil power would at once afford an opportunity, if it should seem to the noble lord and to me to do so, of giving a full consideration to the question of the rights of the Irish estates altogether. But I am coming to that subject now, as I think I have said all that it is necessary for me to say at this moment upon the subject of the rights of the Irish Church, and I am sure that the question of the Established Church in Ireland—(loud cheers)—with regard to which I must say that it has been with a satisfaction almost equalled by my surprise by the noble lord's explanation of his own opinion that has taken place upon this subject, both within and without this House, whether I measure it by the arguments and the tone of those who recommend it, or by the arguments and the tone of those who oppose it, I think that the noble lord's explanation alone, for maintaining the State Church of Ireland, and that is that if it be removed the State Church of Ireland will be destroyed. (Hear, hear.) I am only protesting against the arguments, not all, says the right hon. gentleman, I will undertake to show that there are parishes in England in which the State Church of Ireland is a very good thing, and the Roman Catholics are in a large majority in Ireland. Therefore, in the opinion of the right hon. gentleman, a parish is the same thing as a nation, and whatever is good for the nation is good for the parish. The nation of Ireland you will have to adopt with regard to the parishes of England. (Opposition cheers.) I will only say that in my opinion those who wish to maintain the State Church of Ireland are not worthy of dignity, of stability, and of utility which she now holds, will do well to found her claims upon the labours she performs, upon the services she renders, and upon the good which she does to the people, including that vast number within her communion, and the no small number of those who are beyond her pale, and that those who will not do wisely to leave her her own Church of Ireland, and to argue, as I may say, such an expression as that which applies to the Established Church of Ireland, with its handful of adherents apiece with equal force to the Church of England, with its millions upon millions of supporters. (Loud cheers.) I will call the attention of the House to what appears to me a point of great importance. We have reached a stage in the progress of this controversy, that not only did the noble lord, but the noble gentleman, the Chief Secretary for the universities of particular communities or denominations," but he made a significant intimation with regard to the Presbyterians. The Regium Donum is a very good thing, and it is a very good thing, and it is utterly unsuited to its purpose. What, Sir, is the sequel of that statement? That the Regium Donum is to be increased, on the proposal of the noble lord, and that the noble lord is of opinion that the noble lord have not the least doubt that if, when that were done, there was a fear of thereby exciting a sharper sense of inequality on the part of the Roman Catholic population, allged to be the noble lord's own government, and that he has no assurance that they are not inclined to make the large resources of that country directly tributary to the support of the Roman Catholic Church. (Hear, hear.) Now what is the meaning of that? It is the meaning of that, that the noble lord, in a striking passage of his speech, and the policy of the Government on the Church question was to be a policy of intimation. Oh no, Sir, I heard we have heard that the noble lord is of opinion that the noble lord kept the Regium Donum as we find it, and we have not applied the resources of the Exchequer to maintain denominational universities. But the noble lord is of opinion that the Regium Donum must be increased, that these colleges, if the matter can be arranged in detail, must be sustained, amounts to the noble lord's proposal to add to the burden of the people of this country, and to enable them to continue to enjoy the blessing and the luxury of maintaining the Church Establishment in Ireland. (Cheers.) Now, I do not undertake to determine the question of the Regium Donum in England, and the land in Ireland. Both, it appears to me, are vital. There is a story told of William III., that when the Scotch bishops came to see him, he, being by no means a very good man, asked them whether they would support him. Their spokesman replied, "Your Majesty, we will support you as far as honour and conscience will allow." William, shortly interpreting that to mean that they would support him as far as they could, and as far as they could swim with one hand. He had the support of the authorities in England, he required that of the authorities in Scotland, and he intimated that if the authorities would not support him, they must cease the Irish people to union and to loyalty. Sir, that is our object too, but I am afraid that as to the means the differences are still profound, and it is idle, it is mocking to use such words unless we can sustain them by corresponding substance. (Hear.) That sub-
